With the fall of Berlin Wall and reunification of Germany, many post-war European countries faced economic difficulties. Although private sector turned out to be critical for modernization process, new leaders still were searching for a way to save national budget. However, understanding the specific characteristics of each country as well as its integration with the rest of the world are crucial for an effective reforming process. Trying to evaluate the economic viability of a country is not easy. It's like evaluating a living being. People don't know what will happen to his health or even his state of mind if he is given (as an example) a high dose of some medicine. We don't have that much information about a country if we see its health in the level of its economy. The economic viability of a country is something that can be measured by its GDP, as well as by its costs. It should be measured by comparing two different things: current level of a state and its previous history and future potential. In other words, if a country is currently producing the same amount of products as before, it's already in a steady position. If its economic growth is better than before, then it's in a good position. A country's level of GDP is measured by its own currency. If the country has the same GDP (in this case, in current currency), it means it consumes the same amount of resources. On the other hand, if a country needs the same amount of resource, but its currency goes down, the country's current level of product is going to be lower (in relation to the currency). In other words, it needs more resources. The state is consuming its wealth and has increased its debt. So, it can't buy the same quantity of product with its currency. But its government still wants to continue its producing the same amount of products; therefore it increases its budget. The budget of a country is measured by its own currency. However, this does not mean the country's budget goes down, but its currency goes down. The economy is not in a situation where it has more or less resources than before. Its currency is lower. If a country has a higher currency, a higher economy, and a higher budget, it means it has a higher

I'm currently a second or third year student in CSOL at UC Berkeley. For the past two years, I have worked at a startup company for a month during the summer.

I enjoy trying new things. From skateboarding to painting, I have been doing a lot of hobbies. Since I have worked in a startup office, one of the hobbies which is close to my life is Robot League (a First of it's kind robotics competition in the Bay Area). I am passionate about technical skills and now I am always trying to learn new things to improve my skills on both technical and communication level.

This semester I have focused on learning and improving on coding and algorithm-related topics. I am eager to share my academic thoughts to a group of first year students at Harvard and Yale.

I have been constantly trying to learn the basics of Python.

I have had some problem with three other things.

1. In order to learn better, I will have to leave my current company, and this is quite hard. 2. For me, writing everything down in Wikidata is too difficult.
